

Victoria Chao

In her 24 short years of life, Victoria has hula-hooped with the hula hooping world record holder, visited the prison where Scott Peterson is being held, escaped a monkey attack, co-starred in an educational video for Taiwanese children, survived a side-swipe from a garbage truck, created a trivia game show for high schoolers and been her high school's joke candidate for prom queen. Before she moved to DC to work in public relations for public health non-profits, she worked as a health reporter for an NPR station in San Francisco. She holds a B.A. in International Relations from Brown University, an Ed.M in Educational Technology from Harvard University and won a Fulbright to teach English in Taiwan. She likes running, yoga, turning cartwheels through open spaces and dancing like a medical emergency. Most importantly, she has dressed up as a Pokemon for Halloween every year since she was 14. An extra bonus to those who embrace their inner nerd, build things with their hands, ride bikes, fix her computer, subscribe to her favorite magazines (The Atlantic Monthly, The New Yorker), pay for The New York Times, split and share entrées at dinner, propose rock climbing dates, indulge her insatiable desire for ice cream and join in on her terrible dancing.
